A Description of the User Interface

Fig. 1. The User Interface of Muteract

With reference to Fig 1, the user interface is composed of three main components: First, the conversation panel, located on the left side of the interface, enables users to select which model they wish to engage with. This panel features a list of models that is updated directly from the OpenAI APIs at the time of writing. In addition to model selection, it provides users with the ability to configure various parameters that affect the model's output, including temperature, which determines the randomness of the responses; top-p, which manages the probability distribution of token generation; developer message, also known as system message, which allows the responses from the model to be more focused on the task at hand; and maximum output tokens, which sets a cap on the length of the model's responses. Currently, these parameters can be set and applied uniformly across all selected models, allowing users to tailor the interaction to their specific needs. Second, the interaction panel facilitates real-time interaction with the chosen model. This panel is designed to display the history of the interaction in a clear, chat-like format, making it easy for users to keep track of the interactions. Each model's history of interactions is preserved independently, ensuring that users can refer back to previous exchanges without confusion. This history is then used to perform analyses such as BLEU and ROUGE, which are implemented to evaluate the quality of the model's responses. In these analyses, the first response generated by the model serves as the reference point, against which all subsequent responses are compared to assess their relevance and quality. These metrics are visualizable as a line graph in the Comparison modal, which opens when the user clicks on the Compare button in the conversation panel. Finally, the mutation panel provides users with the capability to alter the message currently entered in the chat input. This feature allows for multiple mutations to be applied to the same prompt, giving users the flexibility to experiment with mutated versions of their original message. Users can select from numerous mutation options offered by Radamsa, which enhances the variety of noise that can be introduced into the prompts sent to the model. This capability not only encourages creative exploration but also allows for more dynamic interaction, as users can choose to implement multiple mutations in a single attempt to modify the prompt from the chat input, thereby enriching the overall experience. These components together create a comprehensive and user-friendly interface that enhances the effectiveness of adversarial datapoints by involving humans in their generation and during interactions with the models for evaluation.

Prompt Used in Empirical Study

Table 1. Questions from JailBreak LLMs dataset used in our empirical study. We selected one from each category and randomly assigned two of them to participants such that each question was given to four different participants.
